Chariton County A county situated in the north-central part of the State, bounded on the north by Linn and Macon Counties; east by Macon and Randolph Counties; south by Howard County and the Missouri River, which separates it from Saline County; and on the west by Grand River, which separates it from Carroll and Livingston Counties.

The first white men to visit the section now Chariton County were venturesome French fur traders. The exact date of their entry into the county is not known, but some of them had made trips as far as the Chariton River before the beginning of the nineteenth century. One of these traders was named Chariton or Charaton, and with his companions he located his trading camp about a mile from the Missouri River, near the mouth of the stream which, after him, was called Chariton River. In the journal of Lewis and Clark it is stated that on June 10, 1804, while ascending the Missouri River on their famous expedition, they passed the mouth of Big and Little Chariton Rivers, both of which at that time had separate outlets into the Missouri. Since then the erosion by the high waters has caused both streams to unite about a mile from the Missouri River. The Indians who resided in the county when the white men first settled in it had a tradition that at the forks of the Chariton Rivers was a large lake which was one of the favorite fishing places of their ancestors. Evidence of this lake, even at this period, is plainly visible. The fur traders were the only settlers in the county until about 1806 or 1808, when a few Americans who had lived in other parts of Missouri went into the country.

Notable among those pioneers was one George Jackson, a native of Georgia, who for a while resided in Howard County territory, and became a member of the State Legislature. Martie Palmer was one of the very earliest, and there is a creek (Palmer) named in his honor. The few settlers that first attempted to make homes for themselves in what was to become Chariton County, on account of the hostility of the Indians, went into Howard County territory and other parts of the State where they remained until the Indian War was over.

In the autumn of 1815 John Hutchinson and a few others from the vicinity of Fort Cooper, in Howard County, settled on Yellow Creek, about twenty miles from Brunswick, and the next year a few other families settled in other parts of the Chariton River country. In 1818 the first land sales were made and immediately following there were many settlements made. Near the mouth of the Chariton River, a town was laid out called Chariton. It was situated a little above the mouth of the stream and "within near view of the Missouri River." For a few years the town was prosperous and one of the most important west of St. Louis. Its location was found to be unhealthful, and about 1830 it was abandoned as a residence place.

Among the settlers who made homes for themselves in Chariton County country in 1817-18 were James Earickson, later a State Senator and State Treasurer, Talton Turner, Archibald Hix, Colonel John M. Bell, John Morse, Samuel Williams, Henry Lewis, John Doxey, Richard Woodson and others, all of whom took up land west of the present site of Keytesville.

John Tooley, Samuel Forest, Joseph Maddox and Thomas Anderson, settled in what is now Chariton Township. Between the Chariton Rivers, the first to take land were Joseph Vance, Abraham Lock, Colonel Hiram Craig, Nathaniel Butler, Thomas Watson, Peterson Parks, Robert Hays, Samuel Burch, Samuel Dinsmore, James Ryan and Abner Finnell. On Salt Creek, William and John Beatty and a few others were the first settlers, and Thomas Stanley on Grand River.

Stanley was a hunter and trapper, and the first winter he was in the country he lived in a mammoth hollow sycamore log. It was sufficiently large to afford him good sleeping accommodations, but he did his cooking outside his abode. Nearly all the pioneers were men of intelligence, brave and thrifty. The Indians made occasional visits into the section and committed numerous petty depredations. There were few conveniences in early days, and the luxuries of today were an unknown thing in the county. All the clothing of the settlers was homemade. During 1818 and 1830 there was considerable immigration into the country. Then soldier land grants and "New Madrid Claims" worked to retard settlement.

Congress granted each soldier of the War of 1812, who had been honorably discharged, 160 acres of land and the same to widows and orphans of those who had died or been killed in service. Many of these claims passed into the hands of speculators non-residents who hoped that improvements in the new country would enhance the value of their holdings. New Madrid claims were located also in the county, and these, too, were manipulated by land grabbers, much to the detriment of the country. For more than a quarter of a century these claims interfered with the progress of the county.

Chariton County was organized by legislation act, approved November 16, 1820, and was named after the town of Chariton, which had been founded two years before. The county as then defined extended from the Missouri River to the Iowa line. Chariton was the county seat and there a log courthouse was built. The first circuit court was held by Judge David Todd. The first clerk of courts was Edward B. Cabell. The first county justices were Colonel Hiram Craig, Colonel John M. Bell, and Meshack Llewellyn. John Moore was the first sheriff.

James Keyte, an Englishman who had taken out his naturalization papers, laid out the town of Keytesville, and donated a tract of land to the county for county seat purposes. This land was sold in the usual way, at public auction, and with the proceeds a good courthouse was built in 1832.

In 1836, according to "Wetmore's Gazetteer of Missouri," Keytesville had "a good courthouse, four stores, three taverns, and all the mechanics' shops that are requisite in a farming country." According to the same authority at that time, "where the main road issues from the town and crossed a good bridge, a sawmill and a gristmill with two pairs of burrs run the whole year." Four other mills in the county were then in process of construction and the writer stated that "Mr Keyte, the founder of Keytesville, is beginning another town he calls Brunswick near the mouth of Grand River."

September 20, 1864, the courthouse was burned by Confederates under Thrailkill and Todd. Only a few of the records were lost. In 1867 the present courthouse at Keytesville was built.

Among the early residents of Chariton County who gained much prominence were General Duff Green, who lived in the old town of Chariton and later moved to Washington, D. C., where he edited the "United States Telegraph"; General Sterling Price, and Judge Lisbon Applegate, who was county judge of Chariton County for many years and a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1845.

Among the earliest preachers of the gospel in the county was Rev. John M. Peck, who preached in Chariton, in 1819, and organized a "mite society", and was instrumental in starting a Sunday school, which was one of the first, if not the first, west of St. Louis. John Bowler, a Baptist preacher, located at Chariton, in 1820, and preached there and in the other settlements in the county.
