Foster and Smith also said they are planning a parade for the group sometime next week. The exact time and route have not been determined but between 50 and 100 Holiday Rambler vehicles are expected to participate.

Quinonez, a wealthy businessman, said "I have no idea" why his family was targeted for the kidnapping.

But Theodore M. Gardner, special agent in charge of the Washington FBI office, said that following the abduction Quinonez was contacted by phone and that a demand of $1.5 million was made for his wife's release as a "war tax." Gardner said the abductors told Quinonez the money would be sent to leftist rebels in El Salvador.

Gardner said that after the kidnapping Mrs. Quinonez was brought by van to Washington and held at Carr's residence. He said federal agents had the residence under surveillance for several days.

Miami media were aware of the abduction early in the week, but were asked to keep the story from the public because of death threats to Mrs. Quinonez. Joseph Corless, special agent in charge of the Miami FBI office, credited journalists in the safe rescue.

"The cooperation and since the press really contributed success. The press really deserves true compliment for what they did in this case," Corless said.

Mrs. Quinonez was stopped driving home from work at estate company. Her Merced found near the couple's home in wealthy neighborhood of sul Coral Gables.

Quinonez, 56, an outspoken communist, received several ransom demands, the first about an hour after the kidnapping when he received a telephone call from the kidnappers at his office. He made further demands Thursday.

The kidnappers, apparently members of an unidentified American terrorist organization, demanded more than $1 million ransom and told Quinonez if he did not pay to authorities for help, his wife would be killed.
